When buildings go bad, local engineers go to work

By WENDY CULVERWELL

When Husky Stadium collapsed during construction in 1976, construction engineers at the University of Washington, supported by a virologist, a toxicologist, forensic engineers, and geologists, investigated the collapse and its causes.

The local office of Construction Technology Laboratories (CTL), of Skokie, IL, has one of the nation's premier forensic laboratories. The lab analyzes samples taken from problem sites. The samples are tested and analyzed, if possible, developed, and analyzed, if possible. The laboratory's main focus is on forensic engineering, which specializes in problems in "nondestructive testing." CTL, JOBSE said, is a leader in the "nondestructive testing." It is able to test things apart, we can test it nondestructively, he said. CTL emphasizes its mission to preserve the original materials. Jobse wouldn't discuss specific cases in which they worked, but he said that in many cases litigation is involved. In those cases, if possible, are developed, when the expense of tearing the concrete apart to see if anything is assembled properly. The moral of the story was that God doesn't generally get involved in the way things work, but one local firm is ready to take a look at any building that goes bad. Local engineers go to work when buildings go bad, local engineers go to work when buildings go bad, local engineers go to work when buildings go bad, local engineers go to work when buildings go bad. District approves budget with smaller rate hikes than planned

BY KURT HERZOG

Federal Way's Water and Sewer District commissioners approved a 1989 budget Tuesday that will mean a significantly smaller rate increase than earlier anticipated.

The district board has not voted on rate increases at its first meeting in March. Rate increases could then go into effect April 1.

There are no projected water service rate increases. The district had earlier projected sewer rate increases of 53 percent over the next two years.

That would mean an increase for the average residential sewer customer from $8.56 a month to $13 this year and to $14.06 in 1990.

The board is expected to vote on rate increases at its first meeting. The district figures could then go into effect April 1.

If you're over 50, learn what you can do to help pay for the plant.

The rate increases are needed for the most part to help pay for the district's new $34.1 million Lakota secondary sewage treatment plant now under construction.

The plant is expected to be finished in January 1990. However, the district staff has projected additional rate increases in several years beyond that to help pay for the plant.

Federal Way girls bury TJ to keep pace

By TIM CLINTON

It is a candid admission in sports to look past an opponent and work on your own team. For Federal Way girls basketball team, that has been the key to success this year.

The Eagles put away Thomas Jefferson, 64-39, at home Tuesday, keeping them two games behind Puyallup (played after crosstown rival Thomas Jefferson). "It would be easy to look over TJ, as they were playing a very scrappy game," Federal Way head coach Chuck Chinn said. "But I don't think you can get your feet stomped out of your shoes so early. The Eagles were doing the wrong thing, improving their South Puget Sound League record to 13-3 and their overall record to 19-7. "We would have liked to have played better against the Eagles, but we were just not up to par," TJ head coach Jerry Beekman said. "Our young team is learning to play basketball, and it takes time to get better."

Lakes was the South with a 9-4 league record and Spanaway Lake was second at 8-6, with Federal Way sticking at 13-6 in the league. "We knew we would have to play our best to get past TJ," said Lakes head coach Joe Schmidt. "We knew they were going to want to get past us, and we had to be ready.""}

Port officials try to block Sea-Tac expansion bills

By RANDY BLACK

Residents of the area around Sea-Tac Airport are taking the fight against the Port of Seattle Expansion to the state lawmakers, who are considering the bill that would bring the airport expansion within the middle of any airport expansion.

Local officials say the port has more direct accountability to King County’s voters and the state Legislature, which is considering the bill that would bring the airport expansion within the middle of any airport expansion.

The House Local Government Committee heard Tuesday that the airport expansion bills, sponsored by the state Department of Transportation, give the county government, the state government and any local government that springs up around the airport, more say in airport expansion regulation and traffic planning decisions.

The port officials said they’re already working with local governments and don’t need the state to be involved in the relationship since they’ve already done so.

They said they’re already doing what the state is trying to do, just in a different way and in opposition to the port’s interests.

The board members also raised concerns about the geographic area covered by the expansion bills, saying they could be too broad.

They also spoke about the process of development, saying it should be taken on a case-by-case basis.

However, the port officials believe the bills are unnecessary and that the process should be handled locally.

Regarding the current expansion process, the port has already consulted with the state legislature and local communities before moving forward.

The port is working to bring airport expansion plans to the state Transportation Commission.

Several speakers told the committee that the port had a tough road ahead of them and that they had to be careful about being accountable to the community.

Fisher said the surrounding communities have never been taken seriously by the port.

King County Councilman Paul Shave said the port was still struggling to bring airport expansion plans to the public.

Port Commissioner Robert DeBlasio, the president of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, pointed out that the bills would “blur” accountability for the community.

“Do you really want the parking garage to be a county decision?” she asked.

Audience members asked.

The committee will probably not have a decision on the bills until next week. The bills may not be ready to move forward.

The bills are expected to make a difference in how the community is involved.

The bills would “let the community have a voice in the decision-making process,” she said.

Some audience members asked.
